Anne Sullivan

Anne Sullivan was born on April 14, 1866, in Feeding Hills, Massachusetts. She was born to Irish immigrant farmers. She had one brother, Jimmie, who was crippled from tuberculosis. Anne's family was extremely poor, and her father was an alcoholic and abusive. When she was five years old, Anne got a serious eye infection that left her almost completely blind. Her mother died two years later, and her father put both of the children in an orphanage. Her brother died shortly after being placed in the orphanage.

When the head of the orphanage came to visit, Anne pleaded and begged him to let her go to school. She was allowed to go to school, and after a few operations, she regained some of her vision and managed to graduate at the top of her class from the Perkins Institute for the Blind.

Anne began some of her most important work when she was called on to tutor a young blind and deaf girl named Helen Keller. Helen was seven years old and very undisciplined. Anne had to teach her obedience before anything else. A breakthrough finally happened, and Anne was able to teach Helen to read words using Braille and the manual alphabet. Anne helped Helen go on to accomplish great things. Both Anne and Helen were invited to make speeches all over the world. Anne's work had a lasting impact on Helen and others, including both blind and sighted people. She continues to be an inspiration.

The Librarian Who Measured Earth

Eratosthenes was born about 2,240 years ago. He studied in the great centers of learning at the time. He became the director of the Library of Alexandria. He was a very successful scientist. He made many important discoveries. For example, he correctly measured the tilt of Earth's axis. In math, he developed a system for finding prime numbers. He also studied the movement of the planets. And he suggested the use of a leap year every four years. According to him, this would keep the calendar correct.

However, his greatest discovery was his ability to measure the distance around the center of Earth. He knew that Earth was round. He recognized this fact because he had seen the curved shadow of Earth during an eclipse. He knew that the sun cast no shadow on a deep well in a neighboring city. This was at exactly noon on the first day of summer.

Trained men measured the exact distance between the two cities. The librarian measured the arc of a circle formed by the two cities at 7.2 degrees. He then divided the 7.2 degrees into the 360 degrees of a circle. He realized that the distance around Earth was fifty times the distance between the two cities. In today's terms, that would be 25,000 miles. Little did he know, his estimate would be proven correct in modern times using exact measuring tools.

5. How did Eratosthenes know that Earth was round?
- A. He drew the map.
 - B. He used a telescope.
